Online Databases Remote Access Limitation

To all Library users,

Please be informed that with effect from 27th May 2010, the Library Management has decided to limit remote access onto subscribed online databases from within Malaysia. This measure is taken due to very high number of logins from scattered countries, and hence this sudden inflating figure is questionable to the library and publishers. With that regard, we need kind cooperation from academic staff and UM students who wish to access the subscribed online databases from overseas to provide us of the followings:-

1. Full name
2. Library ID (eg.: X50081234)
3. Length of stay
4. Country

* Forward the above information to sutarmi@um.edu.my or zaharah@um.edu.my

A special access will only be given after Library make checking and confirmation.

The influence of self-owned home blood pressure monitoring (HBPM) on primary care patients with hypertension: A qualitative study

Abstract

Background: Home blood pressure monitoring (HBPM) is gaining popularity among hypertensive patients. This study aimed to explore the influence of self-initiated HBPM on primary care patients with hypertension. Methods: Six in-depth interviews and two focus group discussions were conducted, taking into consideration the experiences of 24 primary care patients with hypertension. These patients had been using HBPM as part of their hypertension management. The overriding influence was grouped under themes which emerged from analyzing the data using the grounded theory approach. Results: There are both positive and negative influences of self-initiated HBPM. Patients used the readings of their HBPM to decide on many aspects of their hypertension management. HBPM readings both influenced their adherence to diet and exercise and provided certain reassurance when they experienced symptoms. In addition, the act of discussing their HBPM readings with their healthcare providers resulted in an enhanced doctor-patient therapeutic relationship. Nevertheless, HBPM created confusion at times in some patients, particularly with regard to the target blood pressure level and the need for medication. This led to some patients making their own medical decisions based on their own standards. Conclusions: HBPM is becoming an integral part of hypertension management. Primary care patients who self-initiated HBPM reported being more self-efficacious, but lack of participation and guidance from their doctors created confusion, and hindered the true benefit of HBPM.
